Real

Dear Nick Mag,

I'm a faithful reader of your magazine, but I always ask myself, why does Nick Mag use Zelda, and where did she come from? Could you guys help me out?

John M., age 12
Potsdam, New York

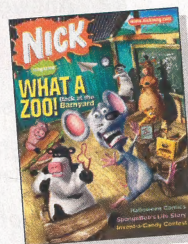

I come from dog people.

Dear John,

Zelda brightens up our pages and dampens the carpets in our office. She originally comes from Oklahoma but found a home (and a couple of fire hydrants) in New York City.

About the October 2008 issue

Dear Nick Mag,

In the October calendar, you said that Edward L. Stratemeyer was the author of the Nancy Drew books, but in fact, it was Carolyn Keene who wrote them.

Emma A.
via e-mail

Dear Emma,

Actually, many people wrote the Nancy Drew books. The series was created by Edward L. Stratemeyer, who wrote outlines that other authors followed. Carolyn Keene is simply the made-up pen name that they all used.

About the November 2008 issue

Dear Nick Mag,

I was looking at your November calendar, and I asked my mom when Election Day was so I could find it on your calendar. We couldn't find it anywhere! How could you not have such an important day? Isn't Election Day more important than some Diddy guy's birthday? You even called this your Election Issue! How come you left it out?

Logan W., age 9
Sacramento, California

Dear Logan,

You are 100 percent right. We really should have mentioned that November 4, 2008, was Election Day. You get our vote for being an astute Nick Mag reader.

Dear Nick Mag,

"Not Heard on the Campaign Trail" made me laugh so hard! I like to follow politics, and that just made my day after all the seriousness. Great issue! It was just classic Nick Mag.

Amanda K., age 14
Corning, New York

Dear Amanda,

Hopefully in 2012, politicians will take our speech balloons on the campaign trail with them.

Really Twisted Tails

On the Lamb

One night, about 10 years ago, the police on the Caribbean island of Trinidad spotted a car being driven with its headlights off—and a chase was on. The cops were closing in when the runaway driver pulled over and escaped on foot, leaving behind two well-dressed passengers in the backseat: a sheep wearing a dress and a goat in a hat, shirt, and pants. Cops found two more dressed-up goats sitting pretty in the trunk.

It turned out that the driver had stolen the animals from a local farmer. The thief had disguised the creatures as people so they wouldn't attract attention riding in the car. Thanks to the police, the farmer and his fashion-conscious livestock were happily reunited.

A Fowl Actor

Percy, a talking parrot, got his big break one November when he was cast in the children's play Pirates of Treasure Island in Dorset, England. The bird was hired to play Long John Silver's parrot, and he even had a few lines.

Rehearsals for the show went smoothly, until one day Percy decided to rewrite his dialogue. Instead of exclaiming "Pieces of eight!" he let fly a string of curses that made his human costars blush. The rehearsal came to a screeching halt—then everyone burst out laughing.

The producers were relieved that an audience full of children wasn't there for Percy's scene, but they didn't want to take any chances. The foulmouthed bird was fired, and the producers had to search for another parrot star.

Stop Bugging Me

A British woman got some creepy news when she went to the doctor in October 1999. She complained that headaches and strange noises in her ear had kept her awake for three nights. When the M.D. peered into her ear with a special instrument, he really bugged out: Snuggled up against the woman's eardrum was a large, leggy spider. Fortunately, the physician was able to remove the live bug from its new home.

Wood You Marry Me?

In 1991, scientists set up 100 wooden albatrosses on some islands in southeastern Japan. They hoped the decoys would attract real albatrosses to the area, where the endangered birds could safely live and mate. The experiment worked really well for the animals, except for one five-year-old male nicknamed Deko. For two years, Deko tried to attract the attention of one of the wooden decoys. He defended her in battle, built her fancy nests, and spent days standing near her, waiting for her to notice him. Now that's devotion!

He should have found another gull.

Real

Here are some wild stories from the wild kingdom.

Ocelot to Be Desired

The ocelot, a wild cat native to the southern U.S. and Latin America, is an endangered species. Since there are so few of them left in nature, ocelots often can't find other ocelots to mate with. So, 10 years ago, researchers at the Dallas Zoo started looking for scents they could put on the Texas range to help attract the cats to one location.

To figure out what smells ocelots like, the scientists worked with ocelots that live at the zoo. Researchers started off, naturally, with ocelot scent. Surprisingly, that didn't get the cats' attention. Then the scientists tried rat feces. Unsurprisingly, the rodent poop didn't drive the cats into one another's arms, either. Then, on a whim, a researcher squirted a spot on the floor with the cologne Calvin Klein Obsession for Men. The ocelots went wild! The animals rolled around on the spot and rubbed the fragrance into themselves.

Researchers have since used the scent in the wild to lure animals for tagging and observation. However, Calvin Klein has no plans to rename his cologne Obsession for Men and Ocelots. □

My Dog DIDN'T Eat My Homework!

Sometimes when you wish your dog would eat your homework, it just doesn't happen. Here are some of the excuses your pup might have if he or she could talk:

Geometry problems give me heartburn.

If you had actually done your homework, I might have eaten it.

History essays don't turn into gravy when you add water.

Sorry, I've already eaten too much of the neighbor's garbage.

I'm on a diet, and homework has way too many calories.

Thanks, but I already stuffed myself with your sister's homework.

I only eat A+ papers—and, frankly, this one's a B.

I want you to do well in school and get a good job so that you can buy me some real food one day.

Next time, don't put it in one of those cheesy plastic binders.

I only eat shoes.

I'm watching my paper weight.

AMERICA'S LEAST WANTED

Robbing a bank is a dumb thing to do.
But for some would-be thieves, the stupidity doesn't stop there.
Here are some examples of criminal mindlessness.

Real

EXCUSE ME, WHAT'S THE QUICKEST WAY TO JAIL?

Cincinnati, Ohio In 1997, a New Jersey man was in Ohio and decided to rob a bank. When the teller handed over the money, the robber asked her for directions to the interstate. She described how he could get there—and then told the police the directions she'd given the thief. The cops quickly nabbed the out-of-town crook, who was carefully following the teller's instructions.

THE EARLY BIRD
GETS ARRESTED

Santa Clarita, California In 1995, two eager bank robbers showed up at a bank wearing ski masks, but the door was locked. It was only 8:55 AM—the bank opened at 9:00—so the robbers decided to wait around for five minutes. Observant bank employees inside the building and passersby took one look at the two guys wearing ski masks in the warm southern California weather and called the police.

MORE AMERICA'S LEAST WANTED

CURSIVE, FOILED AGAIN!

Pearl River, New York On March 2, 1998, a man walked up to a bank teller and silently handed over a note, which demanded all the money in her drawer. The teller couldn't read the man's handwriting, however, so she called over a coworker to help. The second teller also couldn't make out the message, so they asked a third teller. Pretty soon, a whole group of tellers had crowded around the piece of paper. By the time one of them figured out it was a holdup note, the would-be robber had given up and left.

FAKE OUT

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania In October 1997, a robber stole 11 $100 bills from a bank. Police caught the crook less than a mile away but found only one $100 bill on him. When the cops asked the thief where the missing money was, he explained he had thrown the other 10 notes down a sewer because they were fake. Actually, they were real—they were some of the redesigned $100 bills that the U.S. Treasury Department had introduced a year and a half earlier.

DEPOSITED...IN JAIL

Peterborough, Ontario, Canada In early 1996, the police were able to solve a local bank robbery in record time. A few hours after the crime took place, the crook returned to the very same bank and tried to deposit the stolen money into his account there.

COPPER CAPER

Providence, Rhode Island On January 6, 1990, a thief thought he had scored big when he grabbed four bags of money out of an armored car. The bags turned out to be full of pennies—and weighed 120 pounds. The crook tried to run away with the heavy loot anyway, but he didn't get far before the police caught up to him.

The dumbbell couldn't lift heavy weights.

BUSTED

Arlington, Texas In 1991, a man who had just robbed an armored car didn't realize he had parked his getaway car next to a bus full of tourists. As he ran to his vehicle carrying bags of money, the tourists focused their cameras on the crook and snapped away—and the police used the many photos of the robber and his license plate to find the thief.

MORE AMERICA'S LEAST WANTED

CURSIVE, FOILED AGAIN!

Pearl River, New York On March 2, 1998, a man walked up to a bank teller and silently handed over a note, which demanded all the money in her drawer. The teller couldn't read the man's handwriting, however, so she called over a coworker to help. The second teller also couldn't make out the message, so they asked a third teller. Pretty soon, a whole group of tellers had crowded around the piece of paper. By the time one of them figured out it was a holdup note, the would-be robber had given up and left.

FAKE OUT

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

In October 1997, a robber stole 11 $100 bills from a bank. Police caught the crook less than a mile away but found only one $100 bill on him. When the cops asked the thief where the missing money was, he explained he had thrown the other 10 notes down a sewer because they were fake. Actually, they were real—they were some of the redesigned $100 bills that the U.S. Treasury introduced.

COPPER CAPER

Providence, Rhode Island On January 6, 1990, a thief thought he had scored big when he grabbed four bags of money out of an armored car. The bags turned out to be full of pennies—and weighed 120 pounds. The crook tried to run away with the heavy loot anyway, but he didn't get far before the police caught up to him.

The dumbbell couldn't lift heavy weights.

BUSTED

Arlington, Texas In 1991, a man who had just robbed an armored car didn't realize he had parked his getaway car next to a bus full of tourists. As he ran to his vehicle carrying bags of money, the tourists focused their cameras on the crook and snapped away, and the police caught the man before he could escape.

THE ONLY KIDDINGSLEY CONCISE HISTORY of PRANKS & PRACTICAL JOKES

THE FIRST PRANK

Archaeologists believe that the very first prank was pulled in ancient Egypt, on April 1, 2000 BC. As told in hieroglyphics found in Pharaoh Incredulous III's tomb (below), one Egyptian rings the bell of another Egyptian's home and then runs away. The prankee is obviously upset.

The world's second-oldest prank is believed to be the "Jack-in-the-Tomb" trick, which, to this day, startles archaeologists looking for mummies.

THE PARTHENON-FOR-SALE PRANK

The ancient Greeks were not known for their practical jokes, but they got a chance to yuk it up when the Parthenon (the temple built to honor the goddess Athena) was completed on April 1, 432 BC. Praxiteles, the official Practical Joker of Athens, put a FOR SALE sign in the front yard (above). Athena was not amused, however, and zapped the building into what it is today: an ancient ruin. This is the first-known example of someone not being able to take a joke.

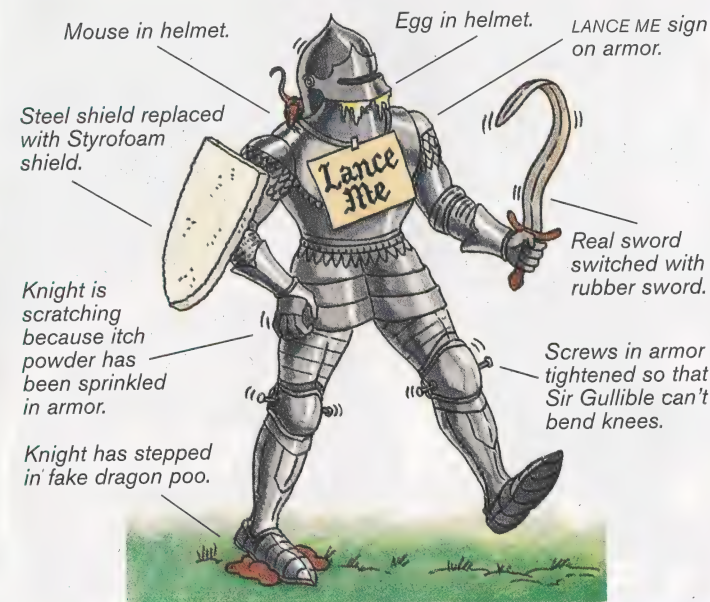

TUNNEL VISION

The Chinese perpetrated one of the greatest pranks of all time, using the 1,500-mile-long Great Wall of China. The wall was first constructed in the 3rd century BC to protect against invasion by Mongolian nomads from the north. Chinese artist Confuse Us added a special twist. She painted a fake tunnel entrance on the wall, which tricked the Mongolians into riding straight into solid brick. That knocked them off their horses—and out of the picture. In addition, the wily Confuse Us made quite a pretty penny at the tollbooth.

ARMORED ANTICS

In days of yore when knights were bold, but somewhat stupid, pages and squires often played tricks on their armored employers. Look at the details in this portrait of Sir Gullible of the Knights of the Pepper Gum Under the Round Table.

LAND HA!

Had King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain known that Christopher Columbus was such a kill-joy, they might have sent someone else to discover a quicker route to India in 1492. While the crews of the Niña and Pinta were busy pulling pranks (short-sheeting berths and toilet-papering the masts were common maritime practical jokes), the crew of the Santa María pulled a prank on Columbus himself. On the day he sighted land, the captain asked for his trusty telescope. What he got was the old black eye trick. Upset, he deprived the crew of shuffleboard privileges for a week.

Behind the Behinds: The Story of the Whoopee Cushion

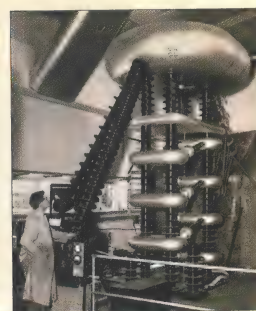

The first whoopee cushion was invented in the late 1800s. While a whoopee cushion might seem simple—you sit on it and it lets out a funny sound—there's a load of history behind each one.

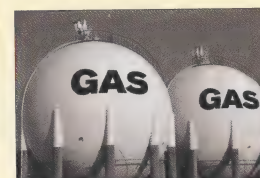

1 In 1876, inventor Dr. Alexander Graham Smell of New York (left) caught wind that Maximilian Flatulitis, a baked-bean farmer from Hoocutwon Creek, Colorado, could not stop emitting gas. For years, Flatulitis had been receiving noise and odor complaints from as far away as Rhode Island.

2 Using an intricate system of pipes and rubber tubing (right), Dr. Smell captured Flatulitis's wind for posterity. Dr. Smell devised an inflatable rubber pouch to contain the gas for home use and called it the whoopee cushion. In 1879, he founded Odorola Inc. to manufacture the cushions on a mass scale.

3 A 1,800-mile pipeline (left) was laid to pump the gas from Colorado to Dr. Smell's tanks in Gastoria, New York, where the odoriferous air is still stored today. Flatulitis produced over 900 bazillion cubic feet of gas in his lifetime, enough to power all the major cities of the world for 200,000 years.

4 The Gastoria tanks continue to supply modern-day whoopee cushions with their oomph—the technical term for the sudden release of energy when someone sits on the cushion.

5 The cushions are still woven by hand at a nearby plant and brought to the gas tanks to be filled. Sound engineers, whose task is to "sit down on the job," test the whoopee cushions for volume and accuracy (left). The Gastoria plant manufactures 30 million cushions a week, as worldwide demand for them continues to rise.

A Woof Over Their Heads

In Nick's newest movie, Hotel for Dogs, two kids turn an abandoned hotel into a haven for stray dogs. The movie stars Emma Roberts, who plays Andi, and Jake T. Austin, who plays her younger brother, Bruce.

Two dogs played the role of Friday: Cosmo and JR. "They were smelly, but they were cute," said Emma.

Five Questions for Emma Roberts

NICKELODEON MAGAZINE:

Are you a dog person or a cat person?

EMMA ROBERTS:

I'm a both person! We have a cat named Stranger. He just showed up at our door one day, so we took him in. And my sister and I recently got a dog—a long-haired Chihuahua named Twiggy.

Jake T. Austin (above, right) and Emma both got along well with the dogs in the movie. Emma told us, "Shep, the border collie [above, far right], was the most well-behaved, cutest dog ever! We hit it off."

How did you get to know all the dogs in the movie?

We practiced holding them and giving them treats. We rehearsed beforehand so the dogs wouldn't be scared of us, and so they would follow and listen to us.

In the movie, there were lots of cool gadgets for taking care of the dogs. Which was your favorite?

I liked the train that pulled all the food to feed the dogs. That was pretty genius.

Were there any mishaps on the set?

One time, two dogs started barking at each other. I got all tangled up [in their leashes], and they ran off.

Did your role as a big sister in the movie influence how you are as a big sister in real life?

I try not to pick on my sister as much [as I used to]. But I love to pick on her just because she picks on me!

Hotel for Dogs is in theaters this January. Check www.hotelfordogsmovie.com to watch the trailer and for more info.

Jake told us that his favorite invention from the movie is the car simulator for the dogs. "I thought that was brilliant and really funny."

Pointers for Your Pooch

Mark Forbes, the animal coordinator for Hotel for Dogs, worked with about 20 trainers to make sure the pooches in the movie gave the best possible performances. He told us about a few techniques you can try with your own dog.*

Repetition: "It's more important to do [lots of] shorter sessions than to do one really long session."

Consistency: "If the dog isn't allowed on the couch, then the dog isn't allowed on the couch. You can't say, 'He's kind of cute. I can let him on the couch this one time.' You have to be consistent!"

Fun: "Make [the training] fun for the animal. If he's not having fun, he's not going to do it."

Treats: "If you want to train your dog to sit, put a little treat in front of his mouth and lift [the treat above his head]."

*Get a parent's permission when trying to train your dog, and be sure to have an adult present.

How do you work out when there's no snow?

When I'm not chasing the snow, I always keep active by hiking, mountain biking, practicing yoga, and surfing. I also work out in the gym in the off-season. It's great for injury prevention and building confidence.

In high school, you were in a group committed to saying "no" to alcohol. Did that choice help get you where you are today?

It's not easy standing out from the crowd, but doing something different than my friends helped me to make other hard decisions. It seems in life that when you take the biggest risks, you get the biggest rewards.

Do you get stressed-out or scared before competing? If so, how do you get past it?

No matter if it's a local competition or the X Games, I always get nervous. What works best for me is...
